Logline

Thien must take responsibility when a family tragedy pushes him to search for his long lost brother in the mystical landscape of Vietnam. His journey, interrupted by enthralling dreams and re-awakened desires, leads him to question what is worth living for.

Synopsis

A reluctant Thien must take the body of his sister-in-law, who died in a freak Motorcycle accident in Saigon, and her five-year-old son Dao, who miraculously survived the crash, to their hometown in the countryside.

Thien begins a search for his older brother who vanished years ago to hand Dao over to him. On the road, Thien has a series of sublime dreams and enthralling encounters that reignite suppressed memories and forbidden desires.

Deep in the labyrinth of these phantom pursuits, Thien battles with his own existential crisis of what is worth living for.

Director's Biography

Director's Statement

I was born and raised in a peaceful countryside town, where industrial crops production is the major occupation. In this region, most people wake up early in the morning and start their day by attending mass in church. At dusk, they gather to read scripture, pray and give gratitude to God after a long day of labour. There, they dedicate a silent time to their own spirituality.

As a young adult, I went to Saigon to learn and work. Without realizing, I embarked in a meaningless, tiresome, repetitive race to earn money and achieve success. Except that I came face to face with nothing but disappointment, confusion and insecurity. To escape, I felt the necessity of becoming more lucid and true to myself. It led me to struggle against the prejudices and empty temptations that dragged me into this endless circle in the first place.

With Inside the Yellow Cocoon Shell, I want to examine how a man's physical journey to his hometown leads him to reconnect with his past. This homecoming reveals his internal conflict between a faith he neglected and a life which makes him deeply unsatisfied.

The journey reflects dimensions of the human soul, something that we constantly seek for but that can't ever fully reach, something connected to our dreams, our passions and the inevitability of death. I believe that we all look towards spiritually to overcome the hustle of superficial modern society. Whether one believes in God or not, one can't avoid questioning who one is, and who one is living for.

Director's Interview

By Wang Muyan

There is an evident connection between Inside the Yellow Cocoon Shell with your previous short film, Stay Awake, Be ready. Can you explain how the idea of this new film was born, and especially how you developed all these ideas into your first feature film?

Pham Thien An: I actually already had the treatment for Inside the Yellow Cocoon Shell before making Stay Awake, Be Ready, even though the initial treatment was quite different from the final version of the film. Stay Awake, Be Ready was constructed based on the first scene of the script of Inside the Yellow Cocoon Shell, and my purpose with the short was to experiment with the rhythm of the film and the mise-en-scene.

Does that mean after this short film, Inside the Yellow Cocoon Shell has been changed or transformed?

PTA: To be honest, when I started making the short film, I was not familiar with rhythm and mise-en-scene in filmmaking at all. At that time I had a minimalised script, and my ambition was to use long shots and complicated camera movements with different angles. But that idea turned out to be impossible because of budget constraints. That was when I improvised to find creative solutions to my limitations. I experimented moving the camera in only one direction and this greatly reduced the number of extras needed. I created a combination of the camera movements and character blocking in a way that their movement in and out of the frame complemented the cinematography and formed layers in the mise-en-scene. Sometimes I was open to the spontaneous situations within the frame to create moments of surprise for the audience. I did everything with a passion and excitement, and everything came mostly from instinct. The whole concept of the film revolves around one thing: the “divine calling”. Despite one’s social class, the “divine calling” has always existed in each of us individually and emerges in different times of one’s life. Based on the concept of that, I developed the characters that were related to myself in the past and present. I consider cinema to be my own “divine calling”.

Can you explain your own “divine calling” ?

PTA: At the beginning I think it was the time when I transitioned between different jobs and felt lost and lonely in this society... At that time I searched for a job which could balance between technical skills and emotional elements, so I started learning about how to shoot good images and then edit them together to create an emotional video. To me, it was easy to do something touching to the viewers, and that was how I started to make my living by shooting and editing wedding videos. It enabled me to be more creative than having an office job. But then it became repetitive with its own limitations, which bored me. So I engaged myself with cinema, as there are no limitations with cinema. There is not any particular formula or rules, which allows filmmakers to create their own world, where they can play with their characters, emotion and time. I realised that in my films, I needed to be sincere to the world I was creating, about what I was communicating in the best way I could. Therefore, I brought into my films my life.

The character in the film is also named Thien...

PTA: The story of Thien might reflect myself: drinking with friends, having a massage, struggling with the work of shooting and editing wedding videos, doing magic to entertain friends, being obsessed with a past love that was beyond hope, wandering sometimes in the mountainous hometown to look for some lingering memories from the past...But I don't think it was an autobiographical film, because to me involving my personal experience was a natural process.

Can we describe it as a road movie that mixed strongly with realism and surrealism or more precisely oneirism? How do you conceive the coexistence of these two points of view and how could you succeed to keep a balance of them?

PTA: I realised and learned about the existence of these concepts when I watched and was lucky enough to “be able to feel” something in the movies of great directors such as Luis Buñuel, Bela Tarr... About applying them into the film, I try to convince the audience by drawing them into a story which is realistic and logical. Then I leave time for them to get to know the characters. Once they already stay long enough, I lead them into a deeper world of the character, like in a “REM” sleep. When the dream is completely constructed, I instruct them further into the surreal world. We are often hypnotised by what we think we know, when we actually don't.

The film sometimes gives us a feeling that it has a strong documentary-like style. Is that intentional ?

PTA: Yes, it was my intention. To achieve this documentary effect, I used these approaches: non-professional actors and if possible, locals, real locations and as much natural lighting as possible, long shots and static camera movements, to create realistic narration. Sometimes, I like to research documentary videos and adapt them into the film. For example, the scene with Mr. Luu : after watching by chance a diary video of a man visiting Mr. Luu, who shrouded for his father before, I was attracted to Mr. Luu's life and was determined to learn more about him. But to incorporate the life story of a non-professional actor like Mr. Luu into the film was extremely hard, especially when Mr. Luu could not memorise any lines. He could only keep in mind his past memories of the war and those memories were quite messy, vague and without continuation. We had to rehearse the scene for 3 weeks so that I had enough time to create a story, with camera movements and mise-en-scene to match with the style of the rest of the film. What I love about the scene was Mr. Luu's vibe and personal experience about life and death, and since the war, he had dedicated his life to shrouding the deceased. His lifestyle and positivity as a war survivor is what I admire greatly.

The film is mainly composed of long takes, and the camera movements are often very slow. Why do you take this artistic choice ?

PTA: About the approach of using long takes and slow camera movements, it came from my own preference and cinematic feeling. On one hand, I liked to challenge myself; on the other hand, I realised that myself as well as the audience needed a certain amount of time to perceive the images and sound, in order to analyse these factors and memorise them to be able to travel deep into the character's world. The slow and long camera movements created empty spaces for the audience to freely observe and wait, and it made them forget the presence of the camera, and therefore, the surprises came naturally in the frames, without any force.

In some specific scenes, you synchronised the real time with the time passing in the film, what's the relationship between these two kinds of time in your opinion?

PTA: To me these kinds of time are parallel, and that is the synchronisation between the heartbeats of the audience and the heartbeats of the main character in the film.

To me, it is based on the correlation feeling that the audience may have with the character who they are watching to develop the storyline throughout the film. Once the audience relate themselves to the character, immersing themselves into the journey unfolding on screen, and share the same heartbeat with the character, the real time disappears and the audience will really live inside the frames and experience the time passing in the film. I think that is also when the border between realism and surrealism is blurred.

How did you work with your DOP, Dinh Duy Hung ?

PTA: The DOP and I have been best friends since childhood. We do not have to spend much time communicating because we understand each other through the cinematic language and share a point of view that the composition and camera movements of the scenes should be based on the real shooting locations. We try to be as minimal and natural as possible in every frame. I always have the idea that the final script would come into shape on set and be spontaneous on set. So we spent a lot of time rehearsing and experimenting on set with the camera movements and actors' blocking. And I proposed appropriate changes for the script according to the weather, the natural lighting, the materials, encounters with real people and nature... a lot of things have to be taken into consideration to create a satisfying camera movement for the shot.

Can you explain your exploration of blocking actors and the camera? Very often, the camera is moving or adjusting with the actors to change the frame size within the same shot. What's your approach towards use of space in relation to the actor for the narrative?

PTA: In the beginning of the filmmaking process, I had the ambition of using long shots and limiting the number of shots and scenes. I realised that if I used a lot of long shots with static wide angles and really few close ups, the film would have nice frames but the expression of the character's emotions and personality was limited. It could distract the audience, they might become lost and would not know what to focus on. And the duration of 3 hours would dishearten them as well.

I understood that the movement of the actors and camera had to relate to one another in every breath of the story. I had to find the balance in every shot, so that the timing of the camera and character movements felt as natural as possible. The starting and ending points of each shot are carefully framed. Sometimes I added some lines or made changes to the script while shooting to match with the limitations or opportunities in which the actors and camera can move at the shooting locations. The close ups usually appear in the end of the shots, when the characters have enough time in the frame. They could evoke the strongest emotions in the scene and the story will be delivered. Besides, this way of expression allowed me to create layers of contrast between the human characters, the natural environment, and add more meaning to the story universe.

Were there many “improvisations” during the shooting? What is your way of work on set?

PTA: Spontaneity was part of the everyday workflow during the shooting. My working process was simply experimenting with changes, adapting and compromising with certain conditions. I liked to challenge my own thought process and find ways to make the limitations of the production into a beneficial element for the film. I do invest time on set to discover an interesting way to unravel a scene.

You work with a small crew, who are often your friends. Does working with friends give you freedom or what kind of benefits does it bring?

PTA : Yes, working with a crew of friends gave me a true feeling of freedom and we really learnt a lot from each other. When we finished the film, they told me that the filmmaking process gave them a lot of knowledge and experience that they had not had in other projects. I was happy about that. To me, everyone has their own strengths and unique energy to do something extraordinary. A film will succeed when the people who make it together give the best of their abilities and passion for it. Especially since we are non-professional filmmakers, our youth and eagerness to try or invent new methods push us to our limits.

In this film, we can notice your attention of showing the contrast between urban/modern and country/traditional in the Vietnamese society. Is that intentional?

PTA: It was actually not my intention. Because I was born and raised in the highlands of the Southern Middle Region before moving to Saigon to study and work, the contrast itself came naturally while I was trying to combine the elements of culture, points of view and the rhythm of life between urban and countryside people together. I did not put a strong focus on this contrast; instead, I was just observing and opening up in the film so that the audience would be able to approach it easily by means of cinema. My goal is for the audience to have a more intimate experience with the culture and people in each of the regions, and this would help them travel with the protagonist along his journey until the end of the film.

How long did the shooting take in total?

PTA: We shot around 110 days, and it was roughly the onset time of all the scenes. We had three main shooting periods: August 2020, November 2020 to January 2021 and then December 2021 to March 2022.

The ending of the film is almost a combination of a man surrounded by myths and dream layers that blur what is life, what is fantasy.

PTA: In the end of the film, Thien may have found “Tam”. Here “Tam” was Thien’s own stranded and forgotten soul. In order to find it, he needed to “take off” his earthly flesh, which was a great struggle in his inner world. It led to a series of surreal images: in the end of the journey, he was able to perceive his freedom like the white moths in the tree or when he took off his clothes to immerse himself in the stream. I don’t want to impose my own opinions on the audience. I want them to freely search for the answers for their own souls, and to freely discover and quench the spiritual thirst inside them.
